As of yesterday, the long-awaited iOS and Android apps for Live Unlimited, a streaming music platform funded by the US military and controlled by the U.S. Navy, have finally landed on user devices. The news comes after almost five months of waiting, which is more than I can remember from any music service launch—not to mention the comparatively shorter wait time for Apple's own iCloud. While Live Unlimited may not have the iCloud we were promised and like, it does offer an alternative way for listeners to experience all of your ripped and modded tracks and streams. Or at least it does on Android at least. Earlier today, I got my hands on the iOS app and used it with a handful of the songs already loaded on my Google Play Music-enabled Nexus 6. I was able to stream a number of songs with no issue, but a few I couldn't. It's early, but if you were expecting smooth playback while streaming all your pirated tunes, you'll be sadly disappointed. Everything I tried to listen to was a little stuttery at times, and when the track was done buffering, there was a brief period of silence before playback began again. I'm not suggesting that there was anything wrong with the library, because it held over 100 songs. I assume the issue is with my server. I'm not allowed to call my internet service provider to try and find out what's up—both the cellular and WiFi options are greyed out in the app. US Army's "Live Unlimited" streaming radio app already available on Android | Image via Tom's Guide Since Live Unlimited is basically a standalone app, the company decided to make it a one-stop shop that ties into both a desktop app and your Google Play Music account. This means you can stream a Play Music library as long as you've enabled Offline Mode. (It's even possible to stream your own ripped albums.) Another benefit of this, however, is Live Unlimited lets you upload new tracks and add new albums without logging into either of your accounts. As for the iOS version of the app, I did have some problems with it. For one, the desktop app doesn't always function correctly when both are open at the same
